"Brenton On Sea Personalities"

Well-known Brenton On Sea residents, Dr David and Esme Edge were recently honoured when a butterfly species, "Erikssonidae" was called after them.

This was announced in an article published in the magazine, "African Entomology" .

Dr Edge' s wife, Esme captured the butterfly while they were collecting specimens in the Waterberg area in Limpopo in 1981. The original samples of the butterfly are being preserved at the South African Museum in Cape Town.

However, the excitement of the honour bestowed on the couple is dampened by the fact that the population of these butterflies is dwindling. When first discovered in the 80' s, their numbers were strong and various factor contributing to this decline, including new farming techniques and the fact that the area is not razed by fire as often as in the past.

"Certain butterflies, especially those whose life cycles are associated with ants, benefit from fires since they allow for healthy growth of specific plants on which the butterflies depend for food" , Dr Edge explained.

Dr Edge has, since last year, been a specialist senior lecturer at the North-West University (Potchefstroom) postgraduate Bio-diversity and Conservation Ecology Programme. He completed his Master' s degree on the studies of the Brenton Blue Butterflies at the same University. Source : Knysna-Plett Herald
